REV COBB —

enough one of the sheep was about to give birth. There in the dust and surrounded by the clamor of India I assisted in the birth. One Indian held the flashlight. Finally, the lamb was born and I felt quite proud. Then, Sahib, another and sure enough there was another awaiting birth. Finally two lambs were facing the world. In two days they were dead. Our only casualties.

Wild Drivers

Our drivers played chicken with every truck or car that we met on the road. Imagine rolling down the highway at 50 heading straight into the twin eyes of another vehicle until you swear they must collide and then at the last moment a slight swerve a laugh and on until the next vehicle is met. These drivers are expert in the finest sense of the word.

The Ganges River was our first almost impassable obstacle. Here we had to move the trucks by sail boats on a two hour trip in order to cross. The big trucks moved on to the frail-appearing little boats like a giant stepping into a doll carriage.

How romantic when in the middle of the stream the big sail was pulled up and filled with wind. The craft became a thing of living beauty and the weight of the truck was as nothing.

Finally we reached the far shore and began unloading. One of the trucks as it came off the ship squeezed the boat away from the little bamboo dock and the wheels dropped into the water. An impossible situation for us.

Another truck did exactly the same thing and now was held by tiny ropes clutched by men and children. One slip and $5,000 worth of cattle would be gone.

This was the scene as the sun went down through a dusty haze across the Ganges. In the ghostly half-light we assembled our strength, two trucks and 50 men. At the first pull the ropes parted as though made of thread. Later, now much later, we tried again; just before the pull a little Indian boy said to me, "Sahib, my God has told me this time the truck will come out," It did.

Returning to my perch high on top of the feed truck I look sleepily off toward the north, sleepily, for no sleep in three days, such is the price of adventure.
